

why don't we just pretend that i did write the tarzan poem?
i mean, after all, you and i think and write sufficiently alike
so that i might have written it.
i mean, suppose you had written a poem called
king solomon's mines,
or king kong or simba or crocodile tears or some such thing --
that probably would have given me the idea and i would have sat down and written tarzan myself.

how about a trade: you let me have tarzan and i'll let you have my poem about the snail that lived in the bathtub and called itself jesus.
i know how much you've always admired that one.

what?
you say it's impossible?
you say the best you can do is to let me have poor blind tom even up for my death of simon bolivar.

thanks, ron;
thanks, as we used to say in the fifties,
a heap.

OLIVER SIGWORTH

It was the summer I was mopping up my undergraduate work and I sat in his course in contemporary literature and was always one step behind in his analyses.

So I'd turn it all off and daydream about the novel I was writing three pages an evening.
Well, what I really daydreamed of were publication parties,
talk show appearances, an apartment on the Seine.

Now, five unpublished novels later,
I dictate to my students the same outline of naturalism that I memorized that summer,

and I watch a young man in the back row turn my lecture off

to take a longlegged walk along the quays.
